Analysis of Sydney Riley:

Sydney's Dream story was very engaging and interesting throughout. Upon reading the story I was able to imagine all of the buildings, streets, the sky, the entities like I was there, great use of descriptive detail all around. Her exploration of her exploring wandering around following the unknown woman was interesting as she doesn't say anything to her but just walks away, right past her. The description of the turns, the patterns of the city, and the walk was charming with the detail used throughout the story. What surprised me was the whole new world going into the ivy, a whole new viewpoint the entire story changed of the secret city, it surprised me but kept me even more engaged how she entered another world like crossing dimensions. The change from the woman to the child was also captivating to me as the story continues with the child exploring the secret city, laughing, playing, wandering along the way.

All together the story was very interesting. I'm happy to see there was no sad, or bad ending. The dream felt very entertaining seeing all of the variations of the beginning city and the secret city, I too wouldt want to leave the dream. Well Done!

Analysis of Khalil Almansoob:

Khalil's Dream was fascinating and engaging. When I first read at the beginning, I could feel the competitive game against the neighborhood with the crowd in white. The early description of the village and field as well as the crowd was very detailed, I could picture the field upon reading as the crowd yells "run, run, run". The sudden rush changed as you were only able to walk in the game, the darkness from the crowd as you and your friend are running away changed the mood all together. I did feel a chill when a strange old man pointed at you and told you to go into the cave. It was terrifying as you described the cave with detail continuing inside the cave running away from the audience. I was able to feel the frightened friend as you looked for an exit from the cave, the door at the end of the cave surprised me by seeing the door inside a cave, and ones entering the door. It was just like Sydeney story where you cross another breach or enter a new world, in this case another village as the same older man appears but in the past. I did find it very interesting going back into the past, the part did catch me off guard. The description of the man, running to the red truck, to the airport and inside the plane was very suspenseful wondering what was going to happen as the airplane shook. I could feel the shiver as if the airplane was going to crash. Same goes with the police officer where he takes you into another game the conclusion was very interesting as you play soccer once more and the crowd again throws trash at you running away as you wake up.

I could feel the terrified dream story , it was very engaging and entertaining as well as suspenseful and full of detail as you travel into the 80s to play the same game and crowd you were running from. What a terrifying crowd at the soccer game.

Analysis of Allyson Rhea:

Nothing to analyze in Week 2.
