

Humanities Temporal Range

In the chapter "Humanities Temporal Range" John Green starts off by talking about an old memory he had from when he was a kid. He visited a planetarium show at the Orlando Science Center where there was a presentation about the end of the world and if it will happen soon or way in the future. This experience sparked his imagination. He thought about different types of end of the world scenarios. He then explains how during covid he had a moment where he got scared and thought this might be the end for the human species. John Green explains that an apocalypse will eventually happen, it's inevitable, but humans are going to cause it to happen sooner. Green explains that when the end of the world actually happens he knows that more life will spawn from it and the cycle will continue. John rates the human apocalypse one star but gives Humanities Temporal Range four stars. In my opinion, the reason John Green wrote about this topic is because the end of all human life will eventually happen and it's a fascinating topic since it's frightening as well. I think this topic will help John Green find a life of significance because the end of the world will definitely happen, it's just a matter of when it will happen. If you have no real idea of when all of humanity will end you'll make the best of your life. You will want to make it significant. If someone were to ask me my thoughts on this topic I would say that I'm very interested and it's very difficult to believe that when the sun gets too big or an asteroid hits earth that we will have nothing to defend ourselves with. Overall I would give this topic five stars.
